TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 8.

DANGEROUS POWERS.

The State Arbitration law was impertinent and offensive as it stood before the Legislature commenced amending it. If it is changed after the fashion proposed by its friends at Albany it will become an instrument of oppression almost without parallel should its enforcement fall into the hands of demagogues or unscrupulous persons. The voluntary feature is still nominally retained. That is, employers and employed differing as to wages or hours and conditions of work may do as they please about submitting their controversies to the arbitrators. It is only when they have drawn up their case and con, and invited the decision of the Board, that they become bound to abide by the verdict. The dangerous powers which the arbitrators now desire would reach out to another direction. They want to be clothed with mediatorial attributes, so that they may take initial steps uninvited for the settlement of such disputes. This looks innocent enough on the face. But under its meek exterior lurks the possibility of in finite annoyance to the best interests of business.

One of the amendments proposed makes it obligatory upon the Board to proceed at once to the locality of any strike or lockout and endeavor by mediation to adjust differences amicably. "Blessed are the peacemakers," but how if these mediators should at the outset of their delicate task be prejudiced against the side of the employers? Such a bias is not unlikely to arise, especially if the officials had political ambitions and were slyly scheming for the future support of a "labor party." It is then that they might, if they choose, inflict the greatest injustice on the employers under the plausible pretense of wishing to get at the truth for the benefit of all concerned. They are empowered at their pleasure to subpoena witnesses, compel their attendance, and send for persons and papers. Under the broad license of this power they could compel an employer to bring his books before them, explain the mysteries of his business for the enlightenment of his rivals and for the information of the strikers. Every employer would resent the demand of an outsider to inspect his books as a piece of the grossest impudence. And yet here is a proposition to bare the secrets of his affairs to the gaze of his own hands and of competitors in his line of business. Such an inquiry would be intolerable. Applied with the utmost discretion and tenderness it would be bad enough; but far worse in the hands of men who secretly fraternized with the trade unions for political purposes.

Such a misandrous mediation would be directly productive of dissatisfaction among the employed, and give rise to far more strikes than now occur. The moment that the hands had reason to suppose that their employer could afford to increase their wages they would strike and trust the mediators to compel him to show his books. This mandate, if issued, would be in the nature of a penalty, to avoid which he might prefer to yield to an unjust demand for more wages. If he were making money he would not like the world to know all about it. And if he were losing money in his business he might be equally anxious to screen that unpleasant fact from the public eye. In either case he would be subjected to a species of coercion which would inure solely to the benefit of the strikers. They, on their part, have to papers to produce, no business secrets the disclosure of which would be injurious to themselves. It is perfectly evident, therefore, that this pretended feature of mediation is more objectionable than an arbitration to which both parties are consenting. It is nothing less than compulsion of the most odious, because most deceptive, variety. —N. Y. Journal of Commerce.
